Stationary internal combustion (IC) engines used by the oil and gas industry can be spark-ignited, gas-fired engines or compression-ignited, diesel-fired engines. A rich-burn engine operates with excess fuel in the combustion chamber, while a lean-burn engine operates with excess air during combustion.

Gaseous emissions from IC engines burning different biofuels 2.4.1. Carbon dioxide (CO 2) emission. The use of fossil fuels is a major contributor to CO 2 emissions, where human activities generate about 25 billion tons of CO 2 annually . The use of renewable biofuels can form a CO 2 life cycle because CO 2 is absorbed by the crops; this helps to maintain lower CO 2 levels in the atmosphere ...

The effect of various ethanol/methanol gasoline blend fuels on CO, CO2, HC and NOx emissions. Sometime during the 21st century, crude oil and petroleum products will become very scarce and costly to find and produce. At the same time, there will likely be an increase in the number of automobiles and other IC engines. Although fuel economy of engines is greatly improved from the past and will probably continue to be improved, numbers alone dictate that there will be a great demand for fuel in ...

Working Principle of Internal Combustion Engines. In IC engines (internal combustion engines) the combustion of takes place inside the cylinder, therefore the thermal energy of the fuel is directly converted into mechanical work. the IC engine has a higher thermal efficiency than the thermal efficiency of EC engines.
